BANGOR:

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1837.

We commence to-day the publication of Mr. Webster's speech on the Sub-Treasury bill, and shall continue it from day to day until it be completed. The intrinsic importance of the subject, the necessity of thoroughly enlightening the popular mind upon it at the present crisis, and the high character of the speech fully justify us, we conceive, in devoting our columns to it almost exclusively, for several days.

It exhibits in an unusual degree the peculiar talent of this great statesman, that talent which places him before all other men of his own age and country, if not before all of other times and other lands, the power of disentangling whatever is intricate, of rendering clear whatever is confused, of illuminating whatever is obscure; in a word, the power of thinking clearly and of expressing his thoughts in language so simple and so forcible, that every one who reads may understand. It is this power which has obtained for Mr. Webster, with men of all political parties who have known him at the seat of Government, the reputation of being the greatest man that this country has produced. It seems to be as natural, easy and as much a matter of course for him to simplify a complicated subject, as it is for the Secretary of the Treasury to obscure a plain one. Nihil tetigit quod non ornavit was beautifully said of an illustrious orator of antiquity. He touches nothing which he does not illumine, may be said with equal truth of the orator of New England.

In the commencement of his remarks, he says:

"It is my purpose to state the question; to "present it as well to the country as to the Sen"ate; to show the length and breadth of it, as "a question of practical politics, and in its bear"ing on the powers of the Government; to ex"hibit its importance, and to express my own "opinions in regard to it."

And he fully accomplishes his purpose. And so accomplishes it that every man, as he finishes the perusal of the speech is ready to exclaim, how natural and just, and feels surprised that he had not taken the same view of the subject before. We wish that the speech might be placed in the hands of every citizen, that every voter throughout the land might read it; for we feel assured, that then, there would be but one opinion amongst honest men on this much vexed question.

MR. WEBSTER'S SPEECH.

THE CURRENCY, &c.

Thursday, Sept. 28, 1837.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the bill imposing additional duties, as depositories of the public monies, on certain officers of the Government, with the amendment offered thereto by Mr. Calhoun

Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President, I am opposed to the doctrines of the Message, to the bill and to the amendment of the member from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun.) In all these I see nothing for the relief of the country; but I do see, as I think, a question involved, the importance of which transcends all the interests of the present occasion.

It is my purpose to state that question; to present it as well to the country as to the Senate; to show the length and breadth of it, as a question of practical politics, and in its bearing on the powers of the Government; to exhibit its importance, and to express my own opinions in regard to it.

A short recital of events and occurrences will show how this question has arisen.

The Government of the United States completed the forty-eighth year of its existence under the present Constitution on the third day of March last. During this whole period, it has felt itself bound to take proper care of the currency of the country; and no Administration has admitted this obligation, more clearly or more frequently than the last. For the fulfilment of this acknowledged duty, as well as to accomplish other useful purposes, a national bank has been maintained for forty out of these forty-eight years. Two institutions of this kind have been created by law: one commencing in 1791, and limited to twenty years; and expiring, therefore, in 1811; the other commencing in 1816 with a like term of duration, and ending, therefore, in 1836. Both of these institutions, each in its time, accomplished their purposes, as far as currency was concerned, to the general satisfaction of the country. But before the last bank expired, it had the misfortune to become obnoxious to the late Administration. I need not, at present, speak of the causes of this hostility. My purpose only requires a statement of that fact, as an important one in the chain of occurrences. The late President's dissatisfaction of the bank was intimated in his first annual Message, that is to say in 1829. But the bank stood very well with the country, the President's known and growing hostility notwithstanding; and in 1832, four years before its charter was to expire, both Houses of Congress passed a bill for its continuance; there being in its favor a large majority of the Senate, and a larger majority of the House of Representatives. The bill, however, was negatived by the President. In 1833, by order of the President, the public deposits were removed from the custody of the Bank, and were deposited with certain selected State Banks. This removal was accompanied with the most confident declarations and assurances put forth in every form, by the President and Secretary of the Treasury, that these State Banks would not only prove safe depositories of the public money, but that they would also furnish the country with as good a currency as it ever had enjoyed, and probably better; and would accomplish all that could be hoped in regard to domestic exchanges. The substitution of State banks for a national institution, for the discharge of these duties, was an experiment, which has become known, and is likely to be long remembered, as the "Experiment."

For some years all was said to go on extremely well, although it soon became plain enough to a great part of the community that the system was totally vicious; that its operations were partial, and wholly inadequate to the purpose; and that, sooner or later, they must fail in explosion. The Administration, however, adhered to its experiment. The Bank, it was complained of the louder it was [illegible] Its recommendation was one of the standing topics of all official communications; and in the [illegible] party [illegible] the great [illegible] to remove the currency, and the happy results of the experiment upon the important business of exchange. But a reverse was at hand. The ripening glories of the experiment were soon to meet a dreadful blighting. In the early part of May last these banks all stopped payment. This event, of course, produced great distress in the country, and it produced also similar embarrassment to the Administration.

The present Administration was then only two months old; but it had already become formally pledged to maintain the policy of that which had gone before it. The President had avowed his purpose of treading in the footsteps of his predecessor. Here, then, was difficulty. Here was a political knot, to be either untied or cut. The experiment had failed, and failed, as it was thought, so utterly and hopelessly, that it could not be tried again.

What, then, was to be done? Committed against a bank of the United States in the strongest manner, and the substitute, from which so much was expected, having disappointed all hopes, what was the administration to do? Two distinct classes of duties had been performed in times past by the Bank of the United States; one more immediately to the Government, the other to the community. The first was the safe-keeping and the transfer, when required, of the public moneys; the other the supplying of a sound and convenient paper currency, of equal credit all over the country, and every where equivalent to specie, and the giving the most important facilities to the operations of exchange. Two objects were highly important, and their most perfect accomplishment by the experiment had been promised from the first. The State Banks, it was declared, could perform all these duties, and should perform them. But the "experiment" came to a dishonored end in the early part of May. The Deposite Banks, with the others, stopped payment. They could not render back the deposites, and so far from being able to furnish a general currency, or to assist exchanges, (purposes, indeed, which they never had fulfilled with any success,) their paper became immediately depreciated, even in its local circulation. What course, then was the Administration now to adopt? Why, sir, it is plain that it had but one alternative. It must either return to the former practice of the Government, take the currency into its own hands, and maintain it, as well as provide for the safe-keeping of the public money by some institution of its own; or else, adopting some new mode of merely keeping the public money, it must abandon all further care over currency and exchange. One of these courses became inevitable. The Administration had no choice. The State Banks could be tried no more, with the opinion which the Administration now entertained of them; and how else could anything be done to maintain the currency? In no way but by the establishment of a national institution.

There was no escape from the dilemma. One couse was, to go back to that which the party had so much condemned; the other, to give up the whole duty, and leave the currency to its fate. Between these two, the Administration found itself absolutely obliged to decide; and it has decided, and decided boldly. It has decided to surrender the duty, and abandon the Constitution. That decision is before us, in the Message, and in the measures now under consideration. The choice has been made; and that choice, in my opinion, raises a question of the utmost importance to the people of this country, both for the present and all future time. That question is, whether Congress has, or ought to have, any duty to perform in relation to the currency of the country, beyond the mere regulation of the gold and silver coin.

Mr. President, the honorable member from South Carolina remarked, the other day, with great frankness and good humor, that, in the political classification of the times, he desired to be considered as nothing but an honest nullifier. That, he said, was his character. I believe, sir, the country will readily concede that character to the honorable gentleman. For one certainly, I am willing to say, that I believe him a very honest and a very sincere nullifier, using the term in the same sense in which he used it himself, and in which he meant to apply it to himself. And I am very much afraid, sir, that (whatever he may think of it himself) it has been under the influence of those sentiments, which belong to his character as a nullifier, that he has so readily and so zealously embraced the doctrines of the President's Message. In my opinion, the Message, the bill before us, and the honorable member's amendment, form, together a system, a code of practical politics, the direct tendency of which is to nullify and expunge, or perhaps, more correctly speaking, by a united and mixed process of nullification and expunging, to abolish, a highly important and useful power of the Government. It strikes down the principle upon which the Government has been administered, in regard to the subject of the currency, through its whole history; and it seeks to obliterate, or to draw black lines around that part of the Constitution on which this principle of administration has rested. The system proposed, in my opinion, is not only anti-commercial, but anti-constitutional also, and anti-union in a high degree.

You will say, sir, that this is a strong way of stating an opinion. It is so. I mean to state the opinion in the strongest manner. I do not wish, indeed, at every turn, to say, of measures which I oppose, that they either violate or surrender the Constitution. But when, in all soberness and candor I do so think, in all soberness and candor I must so speak; and whether the opinion which I have now expressed be true, let the sequel decide.

Now, sir, Congress has been called together in a moment of great difficulty. The characteristic of the crisis in commercial distress. We are not suffering from war, or pestilence, or famine; and it is alleged by the President and Secretary, that there is no want of revenue. Our means, it is averred, are abundant. And yet the Government is in distress, and the country in distress; and Congress is assembled, by a call of the President, to provide relief. The immediate and direct cause of all is, derangement of the currency and the exchanges; commercial credit is gone, and property no longer answers the common ends and purposes of property. Government cannot use its own means, and the individuals are alike unable to command their own resources. The operations both of Government and People are obstructed because the money of the country, the great instrument of commerce and exchange, has become disordered and useless. The Government has funds; that is to say, it has credits in the banks, but it cannot turn these credits into cash; and individual citizens are as bad off as Government. The Government is a great creditor and a great debtor. It collects and it disburses large sums. In the h[illegible], therefore, of a proper medium of payment and receipt, Government is a suff[illegible]. But the P[illegible] in the same category; and inasmuch as the whole amount of payments and receipts by the People in their individual transactions, is many times greater than the amount of payments and receipts by Government, the aggregate of evil suffered by the People is also many times greater than that suffered by Government. Individuals have means as simple in proportion to their wants, as Government, but they share with Government the common calamity arising from the overthrow of the currency. The honorable member from Mississippi (Mr. Walker) has stated, or has quoted the statement from others, that while the payments and receipts of Government are twenty millions a year, the payments and receipts of individuals are two or three hundred millions. He has, I think, underrated the amount of individual payments and receipts. But even if he has not, the statement shows how little a part of the whole evil falls on Government. The great mass of suffering is on the People.

Now, sir, when we look at the Message, the bill, and the proposed amendment, their single, exclusive, and undivided object is found to be, relief to the Government. Not one single provision is adopted or recommended, with direct reference to the relief of the people. They all speak of revenue, of finance, of duties and customs, of taxes and collections; and the evils which the People suffer, by the derangement of the currency and the exchanges, and the breaking of commercial credit, instead of being put forth as prominent and leading objects of regard, are dismissed with a slight intimation, here and there, that in providing for the superior and paramount interests of Government, some incidental or collateral benefits may, perhaps, accrue to the community. But is Government, I ask, to care for nothing but itself? Is self-preservation the great end of Government? Has it no trust powers? Does it owe no duties, but to itself? If it keeps itself in being, does it fulfil all the objects of its creation? I think not. I think Government exists, not for its own ends, but for the public utility. It is an agency, established to promote the common good, by common counsels; its chief duties are to the People; and it seems to me strange and preposterous, in a moment of great and general distress, that Government should confine all its deliberations to the single object of its own revenues, its own convenience, its own undisturbed administration.

I cannot say, sir, that I was surprised to see this general character impressed on the face of the Message. I confess it appeared to me, when the banks stopped payment, that the Administration had come to a pass in which it was unavoidable that it should take some such course. But that necessity was imposed, not by the nature of the crisis, but by its own commitment to the line of politics which its predecessor had adopted, and which it had pledged itself to pursue.

It withdraws its care from the currency, because it has left itself no means of performing its own duties, connected with that subject. It has, voluntarily and on calculation, discarded and renounced the policy which has been approved for half a century, because it could not return to that policy, without admitting its own inconsistency, and violating its party pledges. This is the truth of the whole matter.

Now sir, my present purpose chiefly is to maintain two proposition:

I. That it is the constitutional duty of this Government to see that a proper currency, suitable to the circumstances of the times, and to the wants of trade and business, as well as to the payment of debts due to Government, be maintained and preserved, a currency of general credit, and capable of aiding the operations of exchange, so far as those operations may be conducted by means of the circulating medium; and that there are duties, therefore devolving on Congress, in relation to currency, beyond the mere regulation of the gold and silver coins.

II. That the message, the bill and the proposed amendment, all, in effect, deny any such duty; disclaim all such power, and confine the constitutional obligations of Government to the mere regulation of the coins, and the care of its own revenues.

I have well weighed, Mr. President, and fully considered, the first of these propositions; to wit, that which respects the duty of this Government, in regard to the currency. I mean to stand by it. It expresses, in my judgment, a principle fully sustained by the Constitution, and by the usage of the Government, and which is of the highest practical importance. With this proposition, or this principle, I am willing to stand connected, and to share in the judgment which the community shall ultimately pronounce upon it. If the country shall sustain it, and be ready, in due time, to carry it into effect, by such means and instruments as the general opinion shall think best to adopt, I shall co-operate, cheerfully, in any such undertaking; and shall look again, with confidence, to prosperity in this branch of our national concerns. On the other hand, if the country shall reject this proposition, and act on that rejection; if it shall decide that Congress has no power, nor is under any duty, in relation to the currency, beyond the mere regulation of the coins; then, upon that construction of the powers and duties of Congress, I am willing to acknowledge that I do not feel myself competent to render any substantial service to the public councils, on these great interests. I admit, at once, that if the currency is not to be preserved by the Government of the United States, I know not how it is to be guarded against constantly occurring disorders and derangements.

Before entering into the discussion of the grounds of this proposition, however, allow me, sir, a few words by way of preliminary explanation. In the first place, I wish it to be observed, that I am now contending only for the general principle, and not insisting either on the constitutionality, or expediency, of any particular agent. I am not saying by what instrument or agent Congress ought to perform this duty; I only say it is a duty, which in some mode, and by some means, Congress is bound to perform. In the next place, let it be remembered, that I carry the absolute duty of Government, in regard to exchange, no farther than the operations of exchange may be performed by currency. No doubt, sir, a proper institution, established by Government, might, as heretofore, give other facilities to exchange of great importance, and to a very great extent. But I intend, on this occasion, to keep clearly within the Constitution, and to assign no duty to Congress, not plainly enjoined by the provisions of that instrument, as fairly interpreted, and as heretofore understood.

The President says, it is not the province of Government to aid individuals in the transfer of their funds, otherwise than by the use of the post-office, and that it might as justly be called on to provide for the transportaton of their merchandise.

Now, I beg leave to say, sir, with all respect and deference, that funds are transferred from individual to individual, usually for the direct purpose of the payment and receipts of debts; that payment and receipt are duties of currency; that, in my opinion, currency is a thing which Government is bound to provide for and superintend; that the case, therefore, has not the slightest resemblance to the transportation of merchandise, because the transportation of merchandise is carried on by ships and boats, by carts and wagons, and not by the use of currency, or of any thing else over which Government has usually exclusive control. These things individuals can provide for themselves. But the transfer of funds is done by credit, and must be done, and some proper motion for this transfer it is the duty of Government to provide, because it belongs to currency, to money, and is therefore beyond the power of individuals.

The nature of exchange, sir, is well understood by persons engaged in commerce; but as its operations are a little out of the sight of other classes of the community, although they have all a deep and permanent interest in the subject, I may be pardoned for a word or two of general explanation. I speak of domestic exchanges only. We mean, then, by exchange, this same transfer of funds. We mean the making of payment in a distant place, or the receiving of payment from a distant place, by some mode of paper credits. If done by draft, order, or bill of exchange, that is one form, if done by the transmission of bank notes, through the post office, or otherwise, that is another form. In each, credit is used; in the first the credit of the parties whose names are on the bill or draft; in the last, the credit of the bank. Every man, sir, who looks over this vast country, and contemplates the commercial connexion of its various parts, must see the great importance that this exchange should be cheap and easy. To the producer and to the consumer, to the manufacturer and the planter, to the merchant, to all, in all classes, this becomes a matter of moment. We may see an instance in the common articles of manufacture produced in the North, and sent to the South and West for sale and consumption. Hats, shoes, furniture, carriages, domestic hardware, and various other articles, the produce of those manufactories, and of those employments which are carried on without the aid of large capital, constitute a large part of this trade, as well as the fabrics of cotton and wool. Now a state of exchange, which shall enable the producers to receive payment regularly, and without loss, is indispensable to any useful prosecution of this intercourse. Derangement of currency and exchange is ruinous. The notes of local banks will not answer the purpose of remittance; and if bills of exchange cannot be had, or can be had only at a high rate, how is payment to be received, or or to be received without great loss? This evil was severely felt, even before the suspension of specie payments by the banks; and it always will be felt, more or less, till there is a currency of general credit and circulation through the country. But when the banks suspended, it became overwhelming. All gentlemen having northern acquaintance, must know the existence of this evil. I have heard it said that the hitherto prosperous and flourishing town of Newark has already lost a considerable part of its population by the breaking up of its business, in consequence of these commercial embarrassments. And in cases in which business is not wholly broken up, if five or six per cent., or more, is to be paid for exchange, it by so much enhances the cost to the consumer, or takes away his profit from the producer. I have mentioned these articles of common product of Northern labor; but the same evil exists in all the sales of imported goods; and it must exist, also, in the South, in the operations connected with its great staples. All the South must have, and has, constant occasion for remittance by exchange; and no part of the country is likely to suffer more severely by its derangement. In short, there can be no satisfactory state of internal trade, when there is neither cheapness, nor promptness, nor regularity, nor security, in the domestic exchanges.

I say again, sir, that I do not hold the Government bound to provide bills of exchange for purchase and sale. Nobody thinks of such a thing. If any institution established by Government can do this, as might be the case, and has been the case, so much the better. But the positive obligation of Government, I am content to limit to currency, and, so far as exchange is concerned, to the aid which may be afforded to exchange by currency. I have been informed that, a few years ago, before the charter of the late bank expired, at those seasons of the year when the Southern and Western merchants usually visit the Northern cities to make purchases, or make payment for existing liabilities, the bank redeemed its notes to the amount of fifty or even a hundred thousand dollars a day. These notes, having been issued in the West, were brought over the mountains as funds to be used in the Eastern cities. This was exchange; and it was exchange through the medium of currency; it was perfectly safe, and it cost nothing. This fact illustrates the importance of a currency of universal credit to the business of exchange.

REPRESENTATIVE ELECTION. We understand the election in the Palmyra district on Monday resulted in the choice of a Van Buren man.

The Whigs in the town of Palmyra have done nobly, though their unfortunate classification gave them too much to contend against. Last year the tories had a majority, and now the Whigs have a majority of NINETY-NINE.

In the Charleston district there is probably no choice.

Daniel Chase v. n.	240
D. Chase	1
Others	240

Unless the vote for D. Chase be counted for Daniel Chase, (which we apprehend cannot be done with propriety.) there is no election.

GEORGIA. The counties are now all heard from but Baker and Ware, and according to our calculation Mr. Gilmer's majority is 1200 votes. These two counties will give a majority of about 300 votes for Schley, thus making Mr. Gilmer's final majority about 1000 votes. The exact majority cannot of course be ascertained until the meeting of the Legislature. Suffice it to say that Geo R. Gilmer is elected Governor of Georgia for the next two years.

The Convention of Southern merchants assembled at Augusta on the 15th inst. Ker Boyce Esq. of Charleston took the Chair, and a committee was appointed to report the business to be done.

FROM NEW ORLEANS.

FRIDAY, Oct. 13th.

THE EPIDEMIC. We are informed on the authority of the surgeon to the Charity Hospital, that the prevailing epidemic still exists with considerable violence. Not less than forty patients are admitted in that institution daily. We therefore reiterate our advice to strangers and unacclimated persons, not to venture hither till a frost.

The wreck of the brig Napoleon from New York, was fallen in with at sea, on the 16th inst by the ship Ferax, and the Captain and crew carried to New Orleans.

From Pensacola we have received the following intelligence, dated Oct. 7.

We were visited last night and this morning with another gale. It commenced a little before 12 o'clock changing to the southward and westward. Among the sufferers from the gale is the schooner Rockbuck, Capt. [illegible]. The wind has now gone round to the west and there is a prospect of fair weather.

LATE FROM EUROPE. The packet ship [illegible] pendence, at New York, brings London dates to the 23d and Liverpool to the 24th September both inclusive.

The Carlists have now the upper hand in Spain. The new British legion, under General O'Donnell, sustained a signal defeat at Ardaoin on the 14th Sept. The Carlists, under Gomez Uranga, marched from Tolosa, and forced their way into Ardaoin, at the point of the bayonet. The Spanish royalists fled, leaving the brunt of the battle to be sustained by the English, who suffered severely, the streets of the town being covered with the bodies of the slain, and 200 remaining prisoners in the hands of the Carlists.

The U. S. frigate Independence arrived at Portsmouth, Eng. from St. Petersburg, on 26th ult.

By a proclamation of Queen Victoria, the British Parliament is further prorogued to 15th Oct.

The existance of a contagious disease, in one of the low confined neighborhoods about Cripplegate, was officially made known to the Lord Mayor, on the 18th of September; and the discovery seems to have created some alarm. Within a very short time 20 persons had died of it, and strong apprehensions were felt, that if not immediately checked, the disease would spread to other parts of the metropolis.

The papers are more than usually filled with accounts of murders, burnings, robberies, and other outrages, in Ireland.

The accounts of cholera at Marseilles are of the most encouraging nature. On the 12th Sept. the number of deaths was but 11. The disease had made its appearance at Pisa, but not alarmingly. At Rome it had somewhat diminished. The number of nobles who had fallen victims in that city was 140. At Malta the disease had increased.

The Wondering Pipes is playing in London for the benefit of the poor.

"O CONNELL A Peer." The following announcement appears in the Wexford Independent, a Radical journal:

"New Peers. We are informed on authority that cannot be doubted, that our generous and lovely young Sovreign has signified her royal will to have Daniel O Connel numbered amongst her first creation of Peers, with the title of Lord Erin."

A distructive typhoon was experienced at Bombay on the evening of the 12th June. The destruction caused by its visitation was immense. Large vessels of 600 to 1000 tons were torn from their moorings and driven high and dry upon the rocks. There were 14 vessels on shore, eight of them belonging to Liverpool, six of whom were condemned. The loss of European lives was small, but hundreds of native boats went to the bottom with all hands.

An earthquake occurred at the island of Saporoac, one of the Moluccas, on the 21st June, doing great damage.

Swimming battle between two Bona-fide Mermaids. There's a girl at St. Malo, France, famous for swimming. There's another at Brighton, on the English coast opposite. This last is considered an incarnate fish, and came over to try her sister Naiade. The French aquatic heroine accepted the challenge and won the prize, a rich dress from the Rue Vivienne at Paris. We are not told of the "wherabout" of this interesting contest, which no doubt gathered immense crowds of spectators.

SUICIDE. William Wright, an Irishman or Provincial, committed suicide in our jail on Monday night, by hanging himself with a rope. He was committed to prison on Monday, charged with having stolen a horse, wagon and its contents a few evenings since, in this city, which were found in his possession, on the Houlton road.

Look out for Store Breakers. We learn that an attempt was made on Monday night to rob the store of Mr. Ayer, on the East side of the Kenduskeag, but the thief was disturbed by the Watchmen. While looking for him inside, the thief leaped from a back window, and escaped. These times make men desperate.

BLOCKADE OF TEXAN PORTS. A notice is published by the Department of State at Washington, under date of 18th inst. that information has been officially received from the United States Consul at Matamoras, that the ports of Galveston and the Brassos, in Texas have been declared blockaded by the commander of the Mexican naval forces in the Gulf.

COTTON CROPS. The steamer John Linton, which arrived at New Orleans on Sunday, the 8th instant, reports that the crops on both sides of the Mississippi have been entirely prostrated. If as bad as reported, the cotton crops, from which so much is expected, to pay the debts and relieve the distress of the country, will be unproductive.

OUR INDIAN ALLIES. About ninety of the frontier Indians are now on their march for the swamps and hammocks of Florida. It is said that as an inducement for them to enter into the service of the Government, they have been promised fifty-five dollars a month, while our common troops receive only eight!
